Tetley launches new Cold Infusions product line and wins retail customers with sampling

Successful companies innovate to meet changes in consumer preferences. Many do this by making adjustments to current products, however the very best seize opportunities to not only satisfy current customers, but reach new ones by expanding product offerings and entering new categories.

Tetley, one of the largest tea companies in the UK and one of the biggest globally, recently developed a new line of products called Tetley Cold Infusions. Recognising a growth in consumption of cold beverages, the brand used its core competency in creating hot tea and fruit and herbal beverages to develop Tetley Cold Infusions, a range of fruit and herbal infusions specially designed for cold water.

Leveraging sampling at launch, the company experienced significant increases in retail site traffic and sales.

REVIEWS DRIVE RETAIL TRAFFIC AND SALES

Tetley used Bazaarvoice Brand Edge and Bazaarvoice Sampling to send the beverages to a targeted group of consumers to gather in-depth, honest feedback. This served as a scalable, low-effort way to boost review volume and sales in the retail channel.

"It's about building awareness and educating shoppers who aren't familiar with this kind of product, like what it is, how to drink it, and what to expect from the taste," said Harry Jessop, Assistant Brand Manager, Digital at Tetley.

Bazaarvoice Sampling

A couple months after major retailers began listing the beverages, Tetley launched its sampling campaign, which resulted in hundreds of reviews collected and shared across the Bazaarvoice Network of more than 6,000 brand and retail sites.

At one retailer alone—Asda—Tetley saw a 238% increase in sales in the four weeks following the campaign compared to the four weeks prior. The brand attributes much of this to the impact review volume has on the products' position on search results and category pages on the retailer's site.

"Before gathering the reviews, our competitors had just a couple of reviews, but ranked higher on those pages because we had zero. Now our beverages hold the top spots," said Jessop.

A significant portion of online grocery shoppers add products to their baskets directly from search results and category pages rather than from product pages. This makes a high position on retail sites especially important for brands. These high-level pages display a very limited amount of product information but do include the number of reviews. Tetley recognises the volume of reviews as one of the primary drivers of online conversion.

UNCOVERING CRITICAL INSIGHTS TO INFORM PRODUCT IMPROVEMENTS

Tetley also used the reviews to gain valuable feedback from customers and spot ways to make the products or information about them better.

"We chose of our most engaged customers—the ones who try all our products, read our emails, or interact with us in a variety of ways. This ensured we received honest, informative reviews," said Jessop.

The reviews from those who received samples contained more words and details than those gathered in other ways and provided Tetley with interesting learnings and action items.

"For example, a lot of people were interested in the compostability of the product or users were confused in how you brew it, so we updated the online product content," said Jessop.

MAKING SAMPLING A CORE COMPONENT OF FUTURE RELEASES

Expanding its offerings by entering the flavoured water category and supporting the new product line with reviews proved to the brand the value in supporting any upcoming launches with sampling.

“Sampling’s tremendous impact on retail sales means we’ll get products into the hands of customers and request reviews early on as we innovate to address changes in customer mind sets from now on,” said Jessop.
